Have you ever wondered why
most GMP
training courses are often ineffective?

After 20 years of experience in employee training, we have observed that:

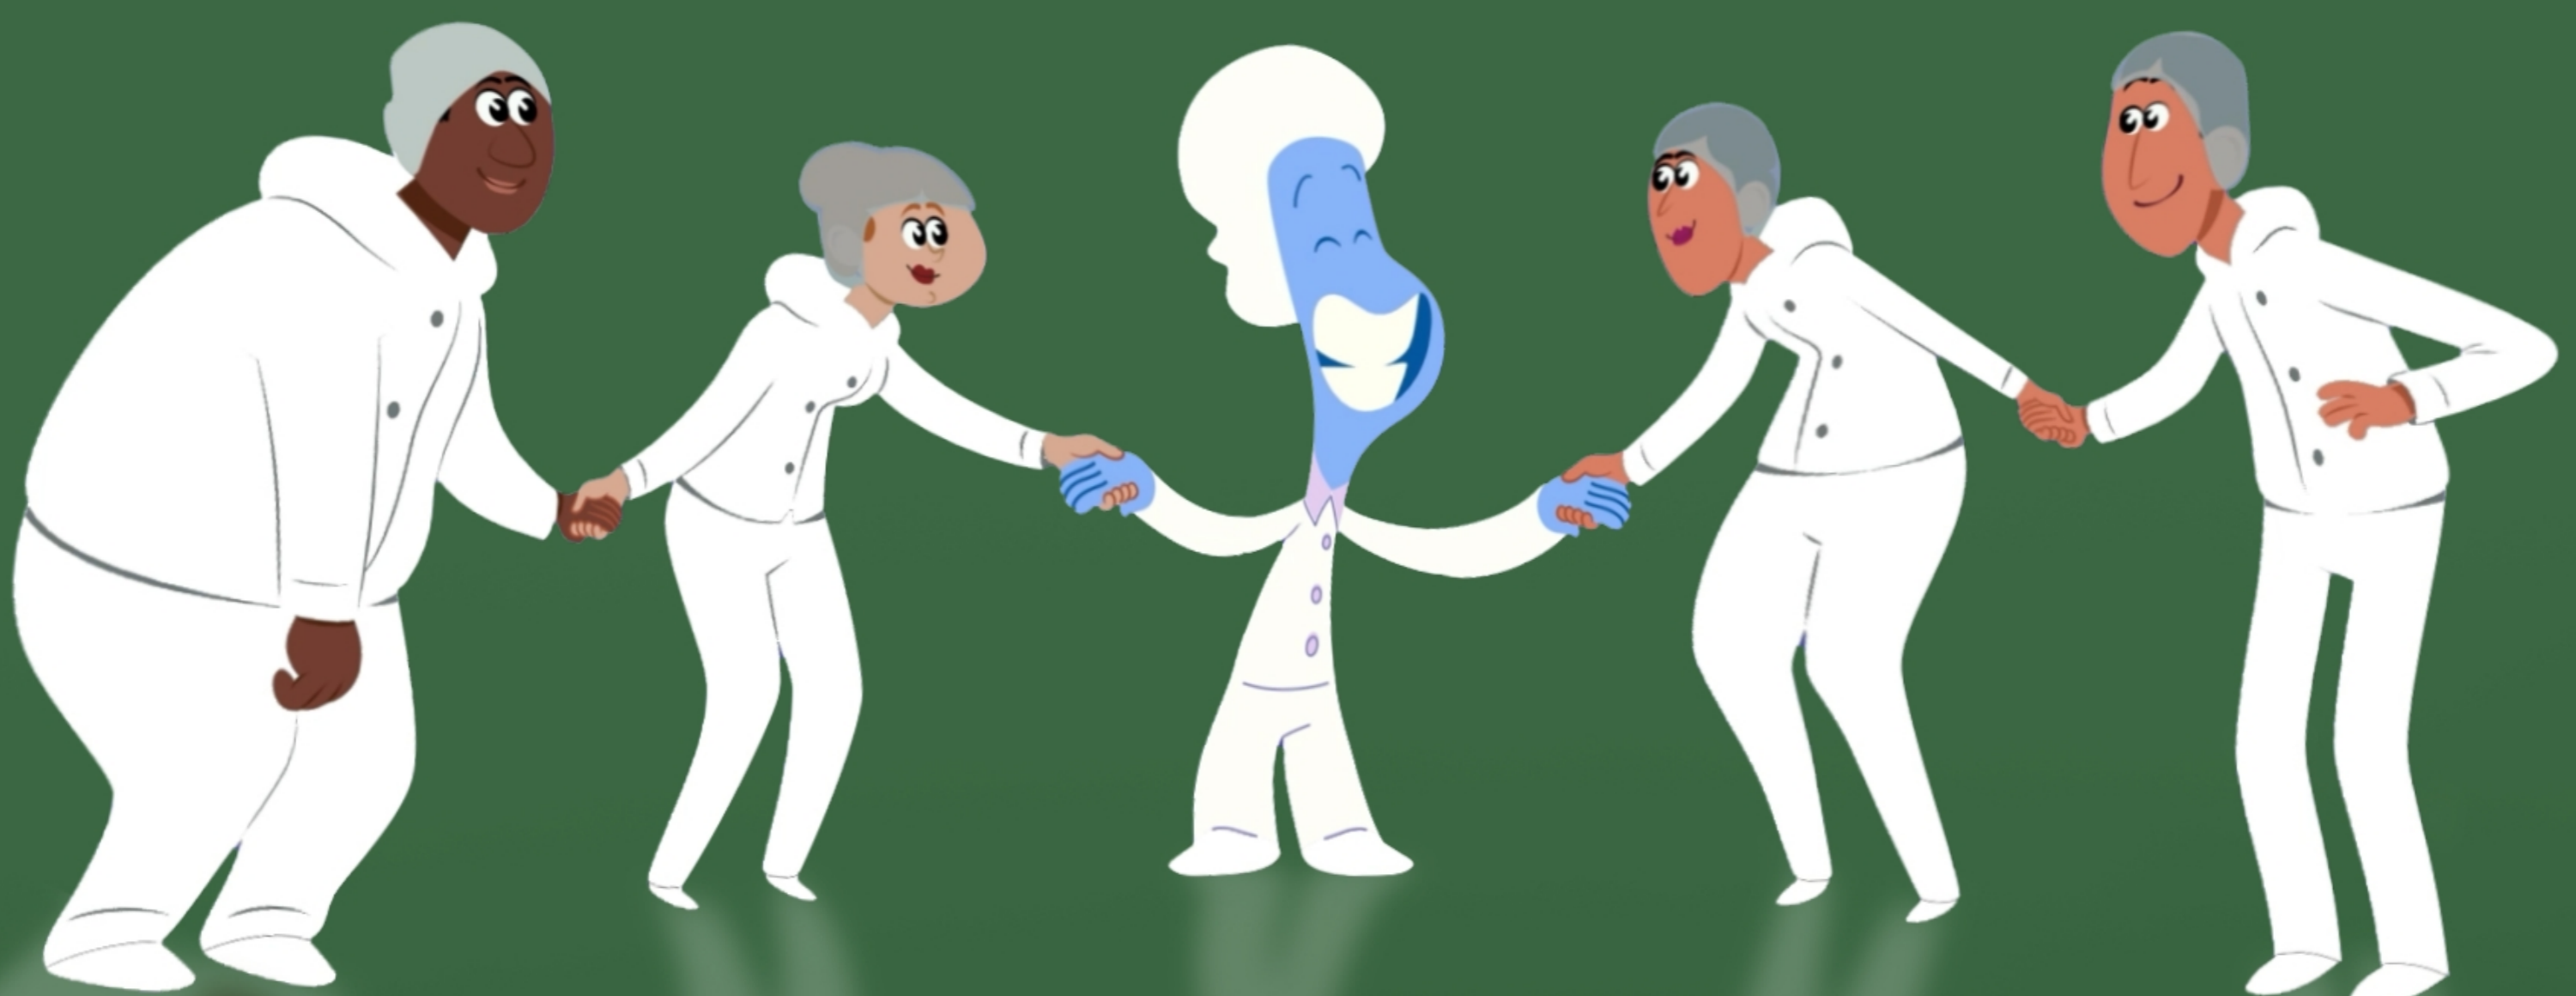

Many employees struggle to understand the way the content is presented.

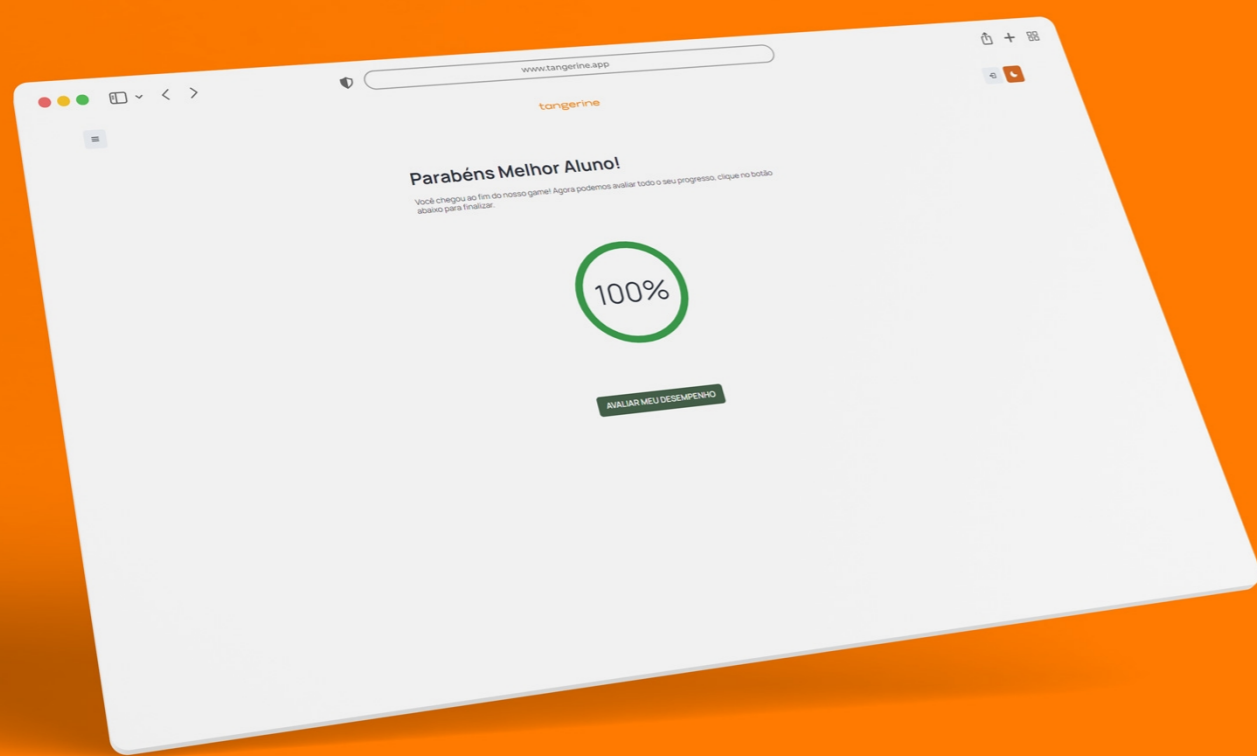

Sitting for hours and listening to someone talk about a technical subject can be boring for some.

Several employees have difficulty staying focused and may start talking to their colleagues or stop paying attention to the content being presented.

The content is often presented as training rather than education. As a result, employees may learn how to behave in a certain way but not fully understand the reasons behind it in their day-to-day work.

Advantages of using gamified training:

Human Resources

Reducing cost per employee.

Eliminating the need to gather all employees in one room.

Providing individualized training.

Enabling evaluation of candidates' understanding of GMP prior to hiring.

Enabling individualized training control.

Quality

Reducing training time while improving results.

Monitoring employees individually.

Identifying employees who need additional attention.

Identifying employees with strong quality aptitude.

Measuring training effectiveness.

Employees

Making training more enjoyable.

Shorter time.

Making training more playful.

Making training easier to understand.

Providing specific examples for the food industry.
